ABSTRACT

This research focuses on the recuperation of Taiwan Dockyard Company during its permutations from a wartime Japanese managed industry to becoming Taiwan Machinery and Shipbuilding Company, and subsequently the Taiwan Shipbuilding Corporation during the early post war period. We look at technological aspects, examine personnel by separating Taiwanese employees from their Chinese counterparts, as well as analyzing their education levels in job categories of management and technology. At the same time we also discuss the capital formation, fund appropriations and corporate management of Taiwan Shipbuilding Corporation during the early post war period.
